Google's patent portfolio has just gained a little weight, as the software/search engine giant has cemented its purchase of more than 50 patents from Magnolia Broadband. There's no mention of how much green Google ponied up to acquire this wireless catalog of goodies, but the new arsenal of intellectual property will likely mesh well with the company's more prominent purchase of Motorola Mobility

. In addition to

possibly putting the technology of this purchase to use, Google is also saving them for future legal quarrels.
